Program

In-house lawyers are frequently called upon to play the dual role of business counselor and legal counselor. A deep understanding of the business and a willingness to act as a business person increases the effectiveness and the perceived value of the in-house lawyer, but also creates challenges for both inside and outside counsel when it comes to maintaining the attorney-client privilege. Increasingly, courts and regulators have refused to apply the privilege to communications with in-house counsel. Learn what every lawyer should know about the current application of the attorney-client privilege and the actions you can take to protect communications and work product and guard against waiver.
